Classification of Horses

Approved by Professor G. M. Shaw of the Animal Husbandry Department of the University of Saskatchewan.

DRAY DRAFT. This type consists of a well compacted well made horse from 1000 pounds up. The head appears rather small in the general offering, but good ears, good jaw, strong shoulders and sloping pasterns are essential. Height varies with age, weight and condition. The horse should be "dray-like" - a term that is a little hard to express, but still as one that is usually understood by horsemen. His actions must also be good carrying the body close and going straight and free.

AGRICULTURAL. Agricultural horses should weigh from 1000 to 1300 pounds and be of rather more rangy formation than a dray horse. They should not be as low nor almost average in height as a dray, should be a good deal of length from the ground sloping shoulders and sloping pasterns. Weight should be given them to weight down the head and prevent them from being too high and free from paddles or overreaching. There must be a good action, but a horse need go no higher with a strong, firm springy stride. These are the type that is most useful on the working farm for hauling big implements in fields and

GENERAL PURPOSE. A general purpose horse on the farm implies one suitable for use in a number of operations, possibly under different names. It weighs 1000 pounds and may range from 1000 to 1300 pounds. These horses must be well made and are usually lighter off than most of the other types. Having strong bones will be good here. There should have been no lameness in the body and gait regular. A good test is to decide whether or not the horse can perform under saddle or driven single to a buggy. If there are two horses at the bidding, bid both such that are not horses. I prefer higher
